Seventy-three knees (60 women, 13 men; age range, 73 to 87 years; mean, 80 years) with osteoarthritis received a Duracon TK total knee arthroplasty without the use of autogenous bone. Knee flexion at time of operation averaged 50 degrees. Four minor complications occurred. Two patients with simultaneous total hip arthroplasties had persistent thigh pain and stiffness. One patient with prior bilateral hip arthroplasties had thigh cramps. One patient had pain and swelling after surgery. The patients with complications had their implants removed, were managed nonsurgically, and had good or excellent pain relief after one to 6 months. One patient died from a traffic accident 4 years after surgery. This study suggests that total knee arthroplasty without the use of autogenous bone can be a viable alternative for patients who are older, arthritic, and less weight-bearing.new coffee roaster.
