Domains of Activity Domains of Activity is an effort to address an issue that's all too common to engineers and researchers: when the time comes to describe or document a new system, often a list of domain-specific terms is needed to fully describe the system and allow easier communication with others. Problem Description Domain-specific vocabulary is used all the time. For instance, when describing software that executes on a processor, we talk about instructions, registers, addresses, and so on. When discussing the process of designing hardware, the concepts of chip design and circuit design are used. When talking about specific cryptographic algorithms, we may be using the terms protocol, key length, hash function, entropy, and the like. When describing the behavior of a software-based system, we may use terms such as signal, user, processes, threads, processes, memory, data, operating system, and so on. In this case, we want to create a vocabulary for a new, specific domain of activity: Domain-specific Vocabularies. We envision a website where any domain of activity can be described, and where visitors can suggest (or even write!) domain-specific terms and definitions. Domain-specific Vocabularies is part of Domains of Activity, and we're starting with the "software" domain. Founded in 2011 by Syston, NuNu is the brainchild of Fredrik Welk.
