Bas Ek Pal 2006 Hindi song.ers when necessary, as the number of schematics is small, and having at least one logic analyzer readily available is not always feasible. But most instruments and systems have at least a limited ability to trace bits and pieces of signals, except when the circuits are in some sense transient or noisy. These conventional tools are not well suited for understanding the dynamical behavior of a system because they only check the static bits of a signal. Therefore, a method and a tool are needed for reconstructing and preserving a signal's dynamical behavior, including both the bits and the values of the bits. In conventional static logic analysis, a $\text{xe}2\text{x80x9c}\text{constant}\text{x}2\text{x80x9d}$ is commonly defined as a value of a signal that does not change over time, i.e., the value of a constant is always fixed at the same moment. Other conventional static analysis tools, particularly design synthesis tools, typically have the ability to examine the timing of the constant and may be able to extract timing relationships between such constants. However, these tools do not have the ability to test the dynamical correctness of constants for a timing-dependent design. In addition, these tools can only examine signal timing relationships over a fixed duration, which is the duration of the analysis. Therefore, these conventional tools are not well suited for understanding the dynamic behavior of a system because they only look at the static parts of a signal. In view of the foregoing, there is a need in the art for improved methods and systems for debugging and verifying hardware designs. In addition, there is a need in the art for improved methods and systems for performing static timing analysis of hardware designs, as well as for performing dynamic verification of hardware designs. Broadly speaking, the present invention fills these needs by providing devices and techniques for enabling static/dynamic verification
