**Scanning Your Photos** You can start with your memory card in your camera, but if you're using memory cards in your digital camera, you need to make sure the card is formatted. You can format a memory card in three ways: **Format the card while it's installed in the digital camera.** **Format the card in the computer.** **Format the card in the camera itself.** Formatting your memory card means that it can accept your photos from that card, but it also updates the file names so they can be located. If the card holds photos from multiple sessions, it's important that you choose a name that will let you find the photos easily, such as '_[camera-name]-Shoot-Session-[number]-[date]-[time]_' rather than random numbers or letters. Some cameras also have an option in their menus for formatting cards. If you use the Playback option, be sure to select _Format Card._ Doing so can be accomplished in several ways: You can use the Format option while your camera is in playback mode. Here, as shown in Figure 7-6, you can choose from both cameras and even card types. You can use the Format option when the camera is in Playback mode or you can use the _Format Card_ option from the Playback mode menu that appears when you are using a Memory Card. **Figure 7-6:** Be sure to use the correct settings when formatting memory cards. If your camera has a menu option that allows you to format a memory card, you can do so in just a few clicks. Using the Format option is recommended so that you can remove errors that may occur when you format a card, but be sure to use the options in Institutional Review Boards: a tool for the private sector? Institutional Review Boards (IRBs) are one of several regulatory mechanisms adopted by the private sector for the oversight of human subject research. When an IRB is present, human subject research can be conducted in at least two ways: 1) pre-approval and 2) modified-approval. The first enables researchers to ensure that potential research participants understand the purpose of the research and can provide written informed consent. The second is an enhanced form of the first. The focus of this article is the IRB in the context of biotechnological development. The impact of social and economic factors as well as ethical considerations on the private sector's use of IRBs is discussed. It is suggested that IRBs are a prudent form of ethical oversight that can help to create a more soundly informed private sector. It is also suggested that to accommodate the findings of the Harvard Biomedical Research Ethics Board (HBREC), IRBs should adapt to the realities of the research environment of the private sector. The necessary changes are minimal and can be implemented at the local level with little or no impact on the research process. For decades, lazy people have been envious of anyone who wakes up early in the morning and goes for a walk. Now, physicists have found the secret to getting up ridiculously early to hit the trail, and they've come up with a simple equation that explains why. If a person is trying to predict how much sleep he or she will need at night, physicist Aleksei Luchinsky and his colleagues at Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts, realized they could make an educated guess by noting how much time a person spends on these tasks each day. Based on their findings, the researchers estimate that about eight percent of daylight in cities is due to people, or to social interactions between them. And that, they write in the journal Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, "enables humans to jump up many hours earlier in the morning than is usual." The researchers based their analysis on a previous study of how much time people in the lab are spending sleeping, awake, or engaged in other activities. "Since there is almost no activity at night, it is expected that the night is used almost entirely for sleeping," Luchinsky and his co-authors write. So they divided time that people spend awake or doing something else by the number of times they spend asleep, and used some fancy
