Additionally, they have found that people with certain types of immune disorders, such as Crohn's disease and inflammatory bowel disease, have different microbiomes than people without these diseases. However, a study released earlier this year found no differences between the microbiomes of healthy people and those with inflammatory bowel disease (IBD). Now, a team led by Nancy Fineman, MD, PhD, of the National Institutes of Health, have found that the overall richness (number of types of species) of the microbiomes of five people with Crohn's disease, five people with ulcerative colitis and 12 healthy controls was not significantly different. But, the diversity (the number of species found in each sample) and the stability of their microbiomes were dramatically different between these three groups. IBD is an autoimmune disease that causes the body's immune system to attack the lining of the gastrointestinal tract, which can lead to inflammation. These studies indicate that the microbiomes of people with IBD are more diverse and unstable than healthy people's, and may explain why certain symptoms are worse in the disease. "We hypothesize that the microbiome is more likely to act as a pathogen when there is a loss of diversity within the microbiome, or when the diversity is unstable," said Fineman. The study, published online today in the New England Journal of Medicine, investigated the composition of the gastrointestinal microbiomes in people with Crohn's disease, people with ulcerative colitis and healthy controls. Fineman and her team collected stool samples from the 15 people over several days and they
