From social media platforms like Facebook and Twitter to email services like Gmail and Yahoo, and even traditional messaging services like AOL and ICQ, web applications are becoming a driving force in the way we communicate today. As more and more people transition online, the foundation of social interactions is evolving from each platform to another. Instead of confusing our users with different services and formats, we should be embracing unified, cross-platform infrastructure. The pace of technological change makes it hard to predict future trends, but one thing is clear: there is no sign of stopping. We are going to keep seeing more features and improvements for the web, which has remained a platform that's built for the people. Enter the Rise of Web Native Web development may have started as a power tool used for web servers, but it is now evolving to a powerhouse that can power mobile and desktop applications, web and native applications. This change is going to continue with its new-found importance and ushers in the dawn of the Web Native. What is Web Native? In modern times, web development is typically about creating hybrid applications. Hybrid applications are applications that blend components to create a web application like Gmail or a native application like WhatsApp. They can behave differently based on their respective interfaces. This process of creating multiple interfaces of an application with the same code base is called Cross-Platform
