In a remote corner of Utah, the young and the restless gather to find out what the future holds. A purposeful stirring. Young voices. The settling down of foundations. The digging and pulling at the old, the giving way of the new. Young hearts. Peaceful dreams. Home out there. Peaceful dreams. Early one morning I crept down the narrow, twisting roads of Salt Lake City's Great Salt Lake park and up into the sand dunes. The place was called Observation Point, at 2,500' (741m) above sea level, a shadeless, grassy dune called Moraine Park. The Quonset huts and lookout towers along this headland are some of the most ancient in the world. Today there is a small building called the Sharp Corporation Cabin, designed and built by an ex-park ranger named Skip Sharp. It is furnished in the style of an early 19th-century frontier homestead, and is open to the public. It is decorated with historical photographs and artifacts; the large screen in the main room, composed of thousands of old photographs, is arranged chronologically. Over the years I have spent thousands of hours in my back yard, watching the dancing clouds. I have known for a long time that the sky will eventually die. It is nature's way. The air will become thinner and thinner; the molecules, like the tiny grains of sand in those clouds, will become more and more spaced apart. And so the sky will fade; it will fade just as the clouds fade. One morning I awoke to see the sun behind a hazy wall of moisture. I called my friends in southern Utah, and told them not to come up, they'd be surprised when they got here. There was a time when we regularly got a hazy weather wall in the afternoon and there was something just amazing about it. We never discussed it; it was just there. It was, to me, almost mystical. A couple of weeks later, as I was
