As the HIV epidemic continues to show an upward trend in Nigeria, there is an associated rise in the frequency of reproductive health issues. This has manifested in the induction of multiple births, premature births, and intrauterine growth retardation. Subfertility, stillbirths, and pregnancy loss has been an issue of concern. Factors such as sexually transmitted infections (STI), unsafe abortion, and lack of knowledge on safer conception methods have contributed to the negative impacts of HIV/AIDS on reproductive health. With a prevalence rate of 6.0%, Nigeria has a higher prevalence rate than any other country in the African region. Despite efforts towards its control and the availability of effective methods for treatment, a large number of HIV-infected women still show poor reproductive health outcomes. This review addresses these factors in order to establish a framework for proper reproductive health care in Nigeria.Computed tomography findings of histologically proven osteoid osteomas in children: characterization of the bony continuity. The authors describe the computed tomography (CT) findings in the bony continuity in children with osteoid osteoma. The study included 10 patients (five boys and five girls; age range, 4-17 years; mean age, 11 years), including six children with bilateral (two boys) and four with unilateral (four boys) osteoid osteoma. A CT scan was obtained in each patient. According to the bony continuity at the center of the osteoid osteoma, the patients were categorized as follows: type A, continuity with a normal cortex; type B, continuity with a nonossified cortex; and type C, continuity with a cortico-cancellous bone. Type A was present in five patients; type B, in five; and type C, in none. The CT findings were similar in the five cases of bilateral osteoid osteomas, with involvement of the medullary cavity at the center of the lesion. On the other hand, the radiologic characteristics of the four cases of unilateral osteoid osteomas were heterogeneous, with involvement of the medullary cavity at the center of the lesion in all cases. CT is useful in characterizing the bony continuity at the center of the osteoid osteoma. Type C is a radiological finding that may suggest osteoid osteoma in children.Q
