Q: What is the benefit of using zero-copy on IPC? I heard zero-copy was pretty much a panacea for everything, but there are some things I've read that suggest otherwise. A common argument seems to be "how will the kernel know if the application is done with the data?". For example on NFS, for instance, it seems the system has to have a way of tracking the data structures because the kernel can't assume it's finished working with the data. Am I missing something? What is the problem with doing straight memory to memory copying? Does the kernel not support it?

A: Zero-copy is definitely a strong point for IPC. In principle, all data transfer is independent of the current state of the application. Some of the arguments you mention are not valid. If data structures are defined before doing the IPC, the kernel does have to know what data is required and how it is structured in order to implement it for the application. Zero-copy assumes the data is not yet known, which makes this easy. Zero-copy also assumes the memory is already allocated, which the kernel may or may not be able to deduce. Zero-copy also reduces the operating system's task of copying memory as it does not need to copy a data structure itself, just a reference.

Q: How to read image binary in PYTHON I am trying to read image binary from file into PYTHON. I am trying this `img = open("sample.jpeg", "rb")` but it is not reading the image into PYTHON. I do know that I can read from JPEG the picture as follows from scikit-image `import imread from PIL import Image img = imread('sample.jpeg')` but this requires a lot of extra components which I don't need.

A: Instead of just using `open`, use this: `with open("sample.jpeg", "rb") as f: img = f.read()` The problem with `open`, and really with any function that opens a file, is that it sets your file pointer to the beginning of the file. When your
