TUAW1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for providing surgical sutures which will overcome or minimize the problems associated with knots sutures. More particularly, the present invention relates to a method and apparatus for providing an interlocking knot suture. 2. Discussion of the Related Art There are times when surgeons desire to use needles that are permanently secured to a length of suture. This is often accomplished by twisting the needle to secure it to the suture, or by tying a knot in the suture to secure the needle and the suture. Other suturing techniques that have been used include lacing, stitching or otherwise securing a suture to a needle, then cutting the suture short, leaving a tip from which the needle is to be drawn. The ends of the suture are then twisted to secure a strand of the suture to the needle. Once the suture has been looped about a target tissue, the needle is withdrawn while holding the suture strands in a given configuration. The use of stitch configurations to connect sutures to needles has also included the tying of knots on the suture. More recently, there has been an emphasis on providing sutures and methods for securing the ends of the sutures to needles that no longer involve the formation of knots in the suture strands to secure the suture ends to the needles. One such means has been the use of crimping sleeves over the suture ends to hold the suture ends in place on the needle. Other attempts have also been made to eliminate knots in sut

Etiology of recurrent urinary tract infections in children. Recurrent urinary tract infection (RUTI) is a common problem in children. The etiologic agents are many but in the majority of children, uropathogens are isolated from a very few sites, making it difficult to identify the responsible organism in each individual case. This review summarizes the currently available data on the importance of various urinary pathogens in the pathogenesis of RUTI in children. Because of the great increase of RUTI due to E. coli over the past few years, it is necessary that all E. coli isolates are fully characterized both phenotypically and genotypically to identify the various O and H antigens, fimbrial types, fimbrial or other adhesins, and pathogenicity factors. In addition, rapid identification of bacteria through the use of specific PCR technology for detection of pathogens (ribotyping, pulsed field gel electrophoresis) is becoming more important.

rotransmitter transporters work in concert with neurotransmitter receptors to terminate signal transduction. Impairment of transporter function leads to psychiatric disorders (e.g. attention deficit eractivity disorder and depression) and brain damage. No experimental models that accurately present the deficits characteristic of these diseases are available. The purpose of the proposed research is to elop and characterize a simple behavioral paradigm for assessing the regulation of transmitter transporters that may be applicable for drug development. One suggested target of antidepressants is DAT; little is known about how this process is regulated in vivo. Two studies are proposed. The first phase of the project requires breeding a transgenic mouse that is DAT-like; then exposing these mice to nic stress. During the second phase, transgene activity will be turned off, allowing the direct assessment of chronic stress's effects on DAT activity in the mouse striatum. With this model, a series of periments is proposed to test the hypothesis that the transcriptional regulator CREB plays a critical role in the regulation of DAT in response to chronic stress. Transgenic mice will be exposed to chronic stress and DAT levels will be measured and correlated with levels of phosphorylated CREB to determine if CREB is activated following chronic stress and whether it has a key role in regulating DAT following chronic stress. 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a device for regulating the flow rate of gases through an orifice. 2. Description of the Prior Art Orifices are usually calibrated or set to a certain flow rate. Alternatively, if the flow rate is varied along with changes in some other variable in such a way that the pressure drop across the orifice remains constant, then the flow rate will be constant. A number of prior-art devices for metering flow rates through such an orifice can be found. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 1,157,516 to L. S. Mowry discloses a mechanism for varying the rate at which air under pressure is introduced.
