Introduction to Direct Action Theory (2009) and addresses the question:

Is it possible to give a new perspective on constructivism? Does the theoretical work of some constructivists (such as Erwin Panofsky, Anna Kallin, Bruno Latour) offer a new way of understanding narratives? Is there a way to narrate a narrative? Is cinema a suitable medium for narrative? She examines questions such as: Why is narrative (narrative structure) and filmic narratives (frames) important? What is a good narrative? How can we give a new perspective on narrative? Do theories help us to understand narratives? Part I focuses on narratives in general. The first part addresses the question of what a narrative is and how it differs from the story. Engelking discusses the various narrators, narrators in the abstract and in the realm of film. In addition, she investigates the various elements in a narrative, such as the structure of a story, the function of a narrative, the structure of a narrative in a film. Part II focuses on the narrators in filmic narratives. The second part deals with aspects of film narratives such as the use of the frame, the causality and temporality of frames. In the third part Engelking makes a strong connection between the structure of narrative and the representation of the story in a film. Part III focuses on the use of different narrators in different narrative films. Here Engelking discusses the different types of narrators and what makes them different. They include the following:...

"film" as a legitimate form of artistic expression. The only point of showing and discussing film as an art form is so that we can all be polite and civil to each other on the internet. This really is a humour site, and after many years of being amused by the antics of the e-pet, it is time to come down with a brand new one. Our e-pet is a cat in training. Nothing fake about the e-pet. We have spent years training the e-pet to respond to email greetings and comments, written in an approved language for the site.

The e-pet responds in kind, providing a real-time dialogue between the owner and the e-pet. Of course we also keep it updated with the latest news, humour and controversy. So come down with a brand new e-pet for the new year, and start playing a game with the e-pet right now. The goal of the e-pet is to add a little colour to your day, without costing you money.
