The relative thermal diffusivity of a spherical particle in the presence of the carrier fluid in steady-state laminar flow conditions. Mathematical expressions are given for the relative thermal diffusivity of spherical particles in a carrier fluid subjected to steady-state laminar flow conditions. Based on a method established previously for relative thermal diffusivity of spherical particles in turbulent flow, it has been shown that the relative thermal diffusivity is independent of the particle diameter for particles with radii less than a critical particle diameter determined by the Reynolds number. This result applies to both binary and non-binary suspensions. Experiments are presented in the case of a low solids concentration, where the results agree well with the theoretical predictions. The experiments are also performed at higher solids concentrations to examine the limiting behavior, for which the results are also in agreement with the theory. The theory is shown to be in good agreement with experimental results obtained in two different vessels with a Reynolds number range of between 200 and 1000. The theory is also used to examine the effects of the relative temperature and solids concentration on the relative thermal diffusivity. Over the years, many different devices have been used to hold together shoe heels, clogs and like footwear. Some of these devices secure the footwear by encircling the foot of the wearer. Other devices mount the shoe to a fixed base and require the user to grasp the shoe in order to remove the shoe. Still other devices secure the foot by drawing the footwear tight against the foot of the wearer and eliminate the need for mounting. The prior art includes U.S. Pat.
