A: You can use "grep" and "grep -v" with a regular expression to get the lines containing the word you want to search, in this case the word "Europe": To search for one word you can use : grep -n "Europe" /path/to/your/file To find all of the lines containing the string "Europe", you would want to use grep -nr "Europe" /path/to/your/file A: The simplest way would be to use the grep command. Assuming your file is in a standard text format (ie, one line per line), simply: grep -A1 Europe file or: grep -A1 Europe file.* To see the lines corresponding to the specific country (and the rest of the lines), use: grep -A1 Europe file | grep -v "^\$" A: You can use sed and Perl, assuming sed is available on your system: sed -n '/Europe/p' infile Perl: perl -ne 'if (/Europe/) {print}' infile edit To extract the map, use: sed -n '/Europe/p' infile | perl -ne 'print if /Europe/' -7*o - 3*o = -48. I use this command to manage my connection to my database: ./manage.py migrate --noinput It works fine when I create my application from scratch, but if I modify some settings (like the username and password) on my local machine, or on the docker-compose file on the remote machine where the container is running, the settings don't get updated on my local container, because the docker-compose file is from another machine. Is there a way to synchronize the database settings on all containers, when they are created or updated? I'm also using Docker Volume. I'm also using a custom management command that runs migrations on all containers on the machine, but of course, it can't run migrations on containers created later. Thank you. A: I think this is going to be a very difficult thing to solve. We are going to have to ask that you do two things. Back up your database on the machines where you have your containers running. Back up the database once every few days or once every time you make a change. If you are using a single database or run multiple in different docker-compose files - each container gets their own database. This means that each container gets its own settings etc. Also, if a container stops for any reason, the database won't be shared. If you are using multiple databases - then you need to create a database service which manages them and shares their data across. This needs to be the same database service on both the docker-compose files and the machines where the containers are running. Note You will need to be in sync between your machines. Ie, once you have pushed your database up to your repository - your projects need to pull
