Come with us on this journey of fun and good times as we root for the St. Louis Cardinals!Would you like to own a piece of history? "This is not just a piece of rock, this is a sign of a past kingdom," said Simon Hanna, as we looked up at a badly eroded yet intact wall of rock that dates back to the Neolithic period – nearly 12,000 years. He was talking about the fragment from a stone axe that I'd been carrying around all afternoon. The stone was grey and weathered, and the axe itself was old and rusted. It was just a few hundred metres from my caravan, which we'd hired for a three-week road trip along the Cornwall coast from the Lizard peninsula. Today, the cliffs in the area are covered with turf and sediment, washed in by the oceans and sea-tides, and I was curious about the possible origin of the piece of stone. What Simon and I had stumbled upon was a stone axe-making workshop, for which there are scattered examples in Europe – mostly in isolated mountainous regions, like the Dolomites, the French Alps, and the Carpathians. But this type of workshop, where stone axes were turned into picks and possibly chisels and other tools
