Earlier this week, special counsel Robert Mueller indicted 12 Russian individuals and three Russian companies on a massive hacking campaign, which began in 2014, long before either Donald Trump or Hillary Clinton even got involved. Mueller's document stated that the Russian gang members, who were planning the election meddling operation, "targeted various entities and individuals associated with the presidential administration." That list of entities and individuals included: George Nader, Trump's adviser on the Middle East and seemingly a close confidant of Jared Kushner. Nader has been described as "an influential go-between for the Trump campaign and the Russian government" during the election. George Nader has been embroiled in his own scandal. Vladimir Putin, the former Russian president, who is still revered as a modern-day national leader, is said to have ordered the $100,000 hack to steal the emails from the Democratic National Committee. He's been involved in the hacking extensively in the past, though it's unclear what his current involvement is. Donald Trump, Jr., and Jared Kushner. Donald Trump Jr. is one of the three campaign officials charged in Mueller's document. The other two were Paul Manafort, Trump's campaign manager, and Richard Gates, a former campaign official. (Gates was later indicted alongside Manafort.) Several links have appeared online that lay out the hacker crew's links with Mueller's prosecutors, those in charge of the investigation into whether Trump's campaign colluded with Moscow: CNN's Jake Tapper traced the first indictment of 12 Russians to Mueller's office 6d1f23a050
