video stabilization can be applied to your clips in a few ways. if you own a camcorder that uses the picture stabilization technology (h.264 files come with the clip anyway). you can use the stabilization in vegas pro, right inside of the video editing window. this makes it feel at first like you need to pay for a separate stabilization tool, but its actually built right into the video editor. however, you can only use it when you choose to, which probably explains why its only available for some files.

alternatively, you can add stabilization tools directly to your timeline from within vegas pro itself, and you can add up to four. its important to remember that vegas pro uses a track system, so if you want to enable or disable any one, you need to track them individually. the viewer window lets you customize your own views and colors for editors, timeline markers, and more. you can also choose how many frames of context you want, the type of markers on the timeline, and any screen edges that should appear on each side. the viewer window makes is easy to find parts of the timeline you want to change without need to scroll through the whole timeline. this should be fairly obvious, but some editing options arent available for live action video. for example, you cant control camera settings such as iso, focus, or aperture. some clips such as redcam footage have audio settings so that you can control audio levels, but vegas pro doesnt have any. you can minimize the amount of information you see by choosing toggles to your preference instead of the default. but, when i did this, i was unable to access the project settings on the top right for settings.

the next problem is we need to upgrade our disk. click finder on your top menu bar, navigate to your application and click the "macintosh hd" icon. select your documents folder and click on the "reformat" button. click the "start over" button. if youre having problems with the screen and cant see anything, you can update your mac os x. turn on your computer and click the power button until you see "start up or restart". hold down the option and click the "restart" button to restart your computer. turn off your mac, and plug it into an external monitor or one of the macbook airs several ports. if you notice any issues, move the mouse and nothing happens. this means that theres a problem with the display. youll need to restart your computer using the "restart" button on the top of your macbook. click "shake" if you see any remaining black screen. the menu of panels on the left side isnt as important as other tools that veyra has, like the timeline or media browser. you cant treat it as a timeline because, as i found out, everything is very sticky and difficult to move around. if you try to move an object or drag it, it will immediately snap back into place. even if you do have a standalone timeline, that window cant be used to jump to different areas of the timeline. i have to go to the timeline property itself and click the selection next button. given that there are only three bars for the timeline, youd have a lot of work moving between them. im sure some people will enjoy this feature, but i didnt during my test editing. the only way to move the timeline is to move it around the same spot or by dragging the slider within a preset area. to jump to a specific time code in the timeline, vegas is kind of limited as i wasnt able to quickly scroll to that code. 5ec8ef588b
