So far, the workings of consciousness have been defined through the theoretical perspectives of neuroscience, philosophy and phenomenology (Chap. 11 ). However, in formal thought systems, we can create an analysis of the properties of consciousness in terms of the physical realm. The physical realm has been subdivided into minituarization (Chap. 7). Can we conceive the operations of consciousness in the brain as a minituarization? Many data from brain imaging and neurophysiology indicate that the activity of the brain is either simple, hierarchical, or multidimensional, it is not minituarization. What is unique is the organization of the information flow in the brain. This is the general organization of information in the brain, not specific to consciousness. Therefore, the condition to explore the dynamical organization of the brain is the condition to explore the dynamical organization of consciousness. [P. 26] This analysis showed that the conscious brain has information about itself. However, it has at least three times fewer states than the universe does. This is because instead of a uniform probability distribution of the states of the universe, as seen in the conscious brain, the universe has a uniform probability distribution of transitions between states. By contrast, the conscious brain has a hierarchical probability distribution, where some transitions are possible only in the presence of other transitions. In other words, from a geocentric perspective, our so-perceived reality appears to us as the only state of consciousness that could exist. However, if we only include it to our calculations, we make a critical oversight. So, what do we call this? What happened to the rest of the universe? We call it the unconscious. In other words, when we are awake, we have access to a vast interconnected network of other realities; however, we are not conscious of this when we are awake (McDougall 2011 ). It is our default state. If we are in it, we are not aware of it. This is to say that we exist in an unimaginably vast network of consciousness. Everything that we perceive, think, experience, or feel seems to arise within this continuously expanding web. The unconscious can only be experienced when the so-perceived reality goes into the background. When we are dreaming or deep in meditation, the unconscious world steps forward and takes centre stage.
