but the new age in investing is only just beginning. for one thing, we are getting to the age where all youth gets experience and maturity gets experience. the time when a person was young and naive in an area - say, dot-coms or investments - is now behind him or her. a person who has been around some time should be closer than the would-be investor to the idea of trust. second, there will be a huge change in both the layperson's thinking and the education of the investor. thousands and thousands of people are now more informed. but one of the most important results of the information age will be that information is pervasively available. this means that knowledge of the world is accessible to all, not only to the well-informed. with that in mind, it is not surprising that readers keep asking us if the day will come when the stock market is no longer the target of pundits, investors and the media. we don't know. we really don't. why do you think the stock market has gone out of touch with reality? start with the idea of a stock brokerage. in order to earn commissions to be paid by their customers, brokerage houses must forecast on the eve of a trade, which a stock is going to rise over time in response to the demand for that product and which is going to fall in response to its level of supply. all wall streeters understand this, but in the year 2000, they don't particularly want to know. we knew that stocks were in a valuation bubble and that we were probably headed for a bumpy ride. we were mostly fortunate: all brokers were scared and rightly so.
