the paper is organised as follows. first, the paper will present an account of the evolution of modern african migration, using the gbmd stock data on african migration to europe, north america and oceania, and the demig c2c flow data on migration to europe. subsequently, it will focus on the deep past, using the gbmd stock data on migration to africa, the demig c2c data on african emigration to africa, and the world bank data on the development of african countries. the paper will then apply these data to assess to what extent contemporary african migration is dependent on the level of development of african countries. the paper will conclude with a discussion of the results. the gbmd stock data on african migration to europe, north america and oceania provide information on the total number of people who have emigrated from africa to europe, north america and oceania. the gbmd data cover the period 1880 to 2010 and give information on 4.3 million emigrants from african countries to the four destinations, which correspond to 0.8% of the total african population. according to the gbmd data, the largest number of emigrants has been recorded from nigeria (1.5 million) and kenya (1.2 million). sub-saharan africa has had the largest number of emigrants from the four selected countries since the 1880s (figure 1). modernisation theory may help us to understand why opportunities for migration increase at a given development level. modernisation theory (mumtaz, 2009) suggests that access to a modernised technology and infrastructure plays a crucial role in the process of development. if modernisation allows people to achieve more and better jobs, the material need for migration may be reduced. the number of high-paying jobs in urban areas also increases as a result of a higher demand for commodities and services. for africa in particular, the theory also suggests that countries with a larger pool of educated workers, and with more educated middle classes, have a better chance of catching up with the rest of the world. education and especially high school completion rates are thus seen as the gateway to development. unfortunately, the theory also points to the fact that modernisation, if it leads to more and better jobs, also increases the demand for labour and the pressure for population growth. for africa and other developing countries, rapid urbanisation and rising education levels are often seen as necessary for economic development.

A History Of Modern Africa: 1800 To The Present Download

this is a study of the civil wars and conflicts in south sudan from 1955 to 2011. I have discussed the causes of these conflicts and the subsequent policies, challenges and problems for south sudan. i have also discussed the problems and challenges in relation to the african union and the united nations and their inability to intervene and assist to stop the conflicts. south sudan became independent of sudan on 9 july 2011 after being a part of sudan for over 100 years. since independence, sudan and south sudan have been at war with each other, and political and economic problems have emerged with both countries. these problems have worsened as sudan has become more unstable and unrest has spread to other sudanese states. in south sudan, the problems of conflict have resulted in a continuing political crisis and a humanitarian crisis, what was the impact of the major rebellions in the 1980s on the countries in which they were triggered? this paper traces the course of the armed insurgencies and the counterinsurgency measures adopted by states in response to them in sierra leone, liberia, guinea, ivory coast and uganda. the paper details how the counterinsurgency measures were implemented and their effectiveness. the paper concludes that the country's experience in africa will influence the success or failure of un-led peacekeeping missions in the future. another important finding is that intra-african migration has not declined uniformly. while, for example, southern africa and west africa have been the most open to migration, with only about 8 and 5 % of african migrants from their countries, respectively, having moved to oecd countries in recent decades, regions such as east africa, central africa and, to a lesser extent, north africa have remained relatively closed to intra-african migration. this relatively high intra-african mobility may partly explain the relatively low levels of intra-african migration, while, at the same time, the higher intraafrican mobility may have led to increased out-migration. the latter is implied by the high levels of intra-african migration in neighbouring sub-saharan countries, and may also in part explain the comparatively high levels of extracontinental migration from eastern africa and, to a lesser extent, from north africa. 5ec8ef588b
