It's been a pretty good week for comments on what, exactly, it means to be a conservative. There's the appearance on Larry King's show by a prominent far-right radio host, who explained that being a conservative means being pro-life, anti-gay marriage, anti-immigration, anti-Muslim and anti-government. Next, we saw the conservative columnist Kurt Schlichter go on Mark Levin's show and issue some threats against his fellow conservatives who support immigration reform. Last week, Lawrence O'Donnell invited the Fox News columnist Charles Krauthammer on his show to debate. Krauthammer pushed back and said that to not be liberal means wanting an end to the government, opposing same-sex marriage, opposing abortion and favoring gun control. None of these things define a conservative, Krauthammer argued, and conservatives should oppose them all. If your views don't include "everything to the right of the Democratic Party platform," Krauthammer said, you're just "a Republican." "Krauthammer: Liberals should be Democrats — they are all the same," O'Donnell said. "For Krauthammer, the only people who can be conservative are those who support government repression, anti-civil liberties, pro-gun control, anti-gay rights, anti-immigration, anti-abortion, pro-war, anti-Muslim and anti-Israel." Well, that's all fine and good, but why should the Republican Party stick to those positions? The Republicans have defended their right to be flexible on some of those positions. (That is, they allow some exceptions.) But why should their flexibility end there? That's what the far-right Fox News host Laura Ingraham wants to know. In her recent New York Times interview, Ingraham
