f1/TA2.1 cells, we made the important discovery that infection of these cells with HBV induces a post-transcriptional event of miRNA replacement of a viral miRNA by miR-122. In light of the primary importance of the interaction between miRNAs and viral miRNAs, the unique position of miR-122 in viral control, and the dual roles of miR-122 in the infected liver, the results are very interesting. One major unanswered question raised by our results is how this replacement of miR-122 by endogenous miRNA triggers the events leading to HCC. It is unclear whether the replacement of miR-122 leads to the dysregulation of the target mRNAs, the loss of bona fide miR-122 targets, or both. Interestingly, the loss of miR-122 in normal liver and in the surrounding cirrhotic tissues is known to be critical for the development of HCC. Since the bona fide targets of miR-122 are not known, it is
