granulomatous condition that may mimic histiocytic dermatitis or lupus erythematosus. Although atrophic atrophicans may be associated with systemic disease, many cases are not. We review the histopathology of atrophic atrophicans, with special attention to the histologic patterns of intra- and interobserver variation. Histopathology with special attention to interobserver variation, pathogenesis, and differential diagnosis. Atrophy atrophicans is a rare granulomatous condition of the skin that typically affects the skin of the extremities. The histopathologic differential diagnosis includes the histiocytic disorders, lupus erythematosus, and sarcoidosis. The authors studied five patients with biopsy-proven atrophic atrophicans. Microscopic review was performed of all specimens. In each case, initial diagnosis was compared with subsequent diagnoses by different pathologists. The histologic patterns of intraobserver variation were also analyzed. The histopathology of atrophic atrophicans includes superficial vacuolar degeneration of the basal layer of the epidermis, with sparing of the stratum corneum. The underlying dermis is normal, but, on the dermal-epidermal junction, there is a prominent perivascular lymphohistiocytic infiltrate. Eosinophils are absent. Patients with atrophic atrophicans have an excellent prognosis, and it is unlikely to recur. The histopathology of atrophic atrophicans, with particular attention to interobserver variation, is a characteristic and useful tool for the correct diagnosis of this entity.i s d i v i d e d b y 1 8 . 1 7 W h a t i s t h e r e m a i n d e r
