So why would I say this? Because of what was done with the new Pencil. To make the Apple Pencil truly useful in Photoshop, Adobe had to go back to the drawing board, as they did before the iPad came out. The previous trackpads and other Apple devices were not Macs or iPads, so what's the point of an Apple Pencil? In that sense, I feel that the Apple Pencil is a brilliant marketing decision: it looks like a real Apple drawing tool (but is also wireless), and because it looks like the edge of a Macbook Pro, it helps the brand with communication. That's a clever marketing move, and I appreciate that iOS engineers did not make a second OS. In terms of a tool, however, I find it to be merely adequate, and certainly not a drawing tool that will affect the way we work on the web. So I think that in the end, we have to admit that the new Apple iPad Pro feels like what it isn't: a completely new computing device with a completely new OS. All Apple seems to care about is how it can work with our existing computers, tablets, and smartphones, and nothing else really matters. iPad Pro is not Mac; it's not a new iPad; the UI is not the same; the OS is not going to be completely re-thought for the iPad Pro, so we have to interact differently with the software. The iPad Pro, having been optimized for touch, seems to focus on small things. In fact, I will say that I really don't want to touch it at all. That may seem a strange thing to say for a device that is kind of a replacement for the iPad, but you must understand that this thing is completely different in terms of usage. Like Apple TV, it is a device that has been totally redesigned for the purpose of being touch-centric, but not really suited for it.

If you're wondering what the different Photoshop CC 2019 Versions feature, it's the major release of Photoshop CC, which is known as the v.12 release. The major version release is the foundation upon which new features are constructed as they are developed and tested. They typically align with the manufacturing release cycle for Adobe software products, and represent the next major release of Photoshop. To create a new feature, the engineers start by testing their code in the next minor release, and then a minor release before that. This process can take a few months. The engineers then tell the creative team and product manager what that new feature will look like. They can also discuss what the differences might be to the current feature set, and what the impact might be to other features. They will show the features to Adobe's legal department and marketing team. Once the work is approved, they will write the specs for the new feature. Once the specs are written, they will create a new application based on the specs and make any changes to the design (such as layout, colors, fonts, etc.) until they're satisfied with the final design. When the engineers feel they're at a good point to show the feature to the marketing team, they can start creating mock-ups and user manuals in Photoshop. When the feature has been approved, they can show the application to the product managers and the Creative Cloud product managers to make sure everything is in the right place, organized, and able to be managed.
